

Cold Calling Script Pack

Five field-tested variations for the free website redesign offer

What's inside

- The master script (clean, annotated version)
- 5 variations tuned for different rep styles and call energy
- Stage directions, pause cues, and tonal guidance
- Common objections and how to flip them
- Internal SOP: GitHub, Netlify, and Supabase setup per client

The offer in one sentence

We build the website for free. If they love it, it's $500 one-time plus $20 per month hosting. If they don't, they walk away. No risk to them.

How to read the scripts

Anything in [red brackets] is a stage direction, not something you say out loud. Pauses are deliberate. People fill silence by talking, and that's when they sell themselves on the call.

The Master Script

This is the baseline. Every variation is a tuning of this. Learn this one cold before mixing in the variations.

[Confident, warm tone. Smile before you dial.]

Hey, crazy question. [Pause. Wait up to 4 seconds. If they say nothing, keep going.]

I was, uh, looking at your website. [Pause. Short, natural.] And, uh... [Slightly hesitant, like you are being polite about saying something awkward.] I think it's costing you some business.

[If automotive shop:] I think it's costing you some repairs to your competitors.

[If restaurant:] I think it's costing you some reservations.

[If dentist, med spa, or salon:] I think it's costing you some bookings.

[Adapt the word to what they actually do. Put their money in the competitor pocket.]

I was just wondering, are you winding down the business, or are you trying to get more customers through the door?

[Shut up. Let them answer. This is the most important pause of the whole call.]

Because there's two things I can do for you. One, I can run your ads and send a ton of customers into your business. Two, I gotta get that website improved first.

But here's the thing. I'm not asking you for any money today. I'll build your website for free. If you like the redesign, it's 500 bucks. If you don't, you can tell me to kick rocks. No hard feelings.

[Pause. Let it land. Free is the magic word.]

If you do like it, we move forward with the 500, and then we can have a quick conversation about ads.

What's your average ticket price? [Or:] How much would you be willing to spend to land a new customer?

[Now you are in discovery. You passed the gate. Take notes.]

The Polite Neighbor

Soft, friendly, low-pressure. Best for older business owners and small-town markets. Sounds like a guy down the street, not a salesman.

[Easygoing, slower pace.]

Hey, real quick question for you. [Pause. 4 seconds.]

So I was poking around on your website earlier... [Pause.] and listen, I don't wanna be that guy, but I think it's actually costing you some business right now.

[Mention the specific thing: bookings, repairs, jobs, reservations.]

Are you guys trying to get more customers in, or are you kind of full up already?

[Wait for the answer. Do not interrupt.]

Cool, cool. Look, two things I do. I run ads, and I redo websites. And honestly, ads don't work great until the website's right.

Here's what I'm gonna offer you, and I'm not asking for a penny today. I'll redesign the whole site for you, free of charge. You take a look. If you love it, it's 500 bucks one-time and 20 a month for hosting. If you hate it, no problem, you tell me to get lost, we never talk again.

[Light laugh here. Take the pressure off.]

If we do move forward, we can talk ads next. Quick one for me, what's your average ticket on a customer?

The Direct Closer

Fast, confident, no fluff. Best for high-volume dialers and B2B owners who appreciate getting to the point. Compresses the pitch into 30 seconds.

[Energy up. Quick pace. Confident, not aggressive.]

Hey, crazy question. [Pause. 3 seconds max.]

I just looked at your website and it's losing you money. I'll be straight with you.

Are you trying to grow right now, yes or no?

[Hard pause. They have to answer. Do not break it.]

Good. Two things I do. I run your ads. I rebuild your website. The site has to come first or the ads waste money.

Here's the deal. I build it for free. You see it. If it's better than what you have, it's 500 bucks plus 20 a month hosting. If it's not, you owe me nothing.

What's your average customer worth to you?

[Now you are in discovery. You moved fast on purpose, so let them slow you down with their answers.]

Why this works

Owners who buy from cold calls usually like decisive people. This variation telegraphs confidence in the first 10 seconds. If they're going to hang up, they hang up early and you save time. If they engage, they're already qualified.

The Curious Outsider

You're not selling, you're confused on their behalf. Disarming. Best for skeptical industries (lawyers, contractors, mechanics) and owners who get pitched constantly.

[Sound genuinely puzzled, not rehearsed.]

Hey, I got a weird question for you. [Pause.] Are you the owner over there?

[Wait for yes.]

Okay, so I was looking at your website and... [Pause, like you are searching for the polite word.] I'm just trying to figure out if you're winding the business down, or if you're actually trying to get more customers, because the site's costing you money either way.

[That phrasing forces them to defend themselves. They almost always say no, we are growing.]

Okay good. So here's the thing. I do two things. I run ads. I fix websites. And I'll fix yours for free. You look at it, you decide. If you like it, 500 bucks plus 20 a month. If you don't, no harm done.

While I'm working on the site, real quick, what's a new customer actually worth to you on average?

Why this works

The 'are you winding the business down' line is the killshot. Nobody admits they're winding down. By denying it, they're committing to wanting growth, which means they have to engage with your offer.

The Industry Specialist

You sound like you only work with their type of business. Highest credibility variation. Use after you've done five or more in the same vertical.

[Confident, calm. You have done this a hundred times for their industry.]

Hey, quick question. [Pause.]

I work with [automotive shops, dentists, roofers, law firms] and I was just on your website. Real talk, you're losing [repairs, patients, jobs, cases] to your competitors right now. I can almost guarantee it.

[Mention one specific weak point you noticed. No booking button on mobile. Not updated since 2019. Slow on phones.]

Are you guys actively trying to grow the shop, or are things kind of where you want them?

[Wait.]

Okay, two things I do for shops like yours. I run the ads, and I fix the site. The site has to come first.

I'll redesign it for you free. You see it, you decide. 500 bucks if you like it, 20 a month for hosting after. If you don't like it, walk away.

Once we're rolling, what's an average [repair, case, new patient, job] worth to you?

Why this works

Specificity beats generality. 'I work with automotive shops' lands harder than 'I work with small businesses.' Calling out a real flaw in their site proves you actually looked, which separates you from 99% of cold callers.

The No-Pressure Friend

Lowest-key version. Almost no sales energy at all. Best for objection-heavy owners and reps who hate sounding salesy. Hardest to master because the offer has to do all the work.

[Almost casual. Like you are asking a favor, not selling.]

Hey, real quick, I'm not selling you anything, I just had a question. [Pause.]

I was on your site and I think it might be costing you some business. I do this for a living, I redesign sites for small businesses.

Are you guys trying to bring in more customers, or are you good where you're at?

[Wait. Let them lead.]

Cool. Look, I'll just tell you straight. I'll redesign your whole site for free. No money down, no contract, no nothing. You look at it when it's done, and if you want it, it's 500 bucks. If you don't, no problem at all, we just move on.

And if it works for you, then we can talk about ads. But I'm not pitching that today.

Real quick before I go, what's an average customer worth to you? Just so I know how much site improvement actually matters to your bottom line.

Why this works

Some owners have a sales radar that fires the second they detect closing language. This variation refuses to trigger it. The offer is so low-risk that the friendliness is believable. You'll get fewer same-day yeses, but a higher rate of callbacks and referrals.

Common Objections and Flips

"I'm not interested."

That's totally fair. Real quick before I go, just so I'm not wasting your time again, is it that you don't need more customers, or just that you've been pitched a lot? [They almost always clarify, which reopens the conversation.]

"How did you get my number?"

Google. Your website's public. That's actually why I called, I saw the site and figured I'd reach out directly. [Pivot back to the offer immediately.]

"I already have a website guy."

Got it. Then this'll be easy. I'll build a version for free, you compare it to what your guy did, and you keep whichever one is better. Costs you nothing to look.

"How much is it really? Nothing's free."

Genuinely free to build. The site only costs you anything if you decide you want to keep it. 500 bucks one-time, 20 a month for hosting. That's it. No retainer, no contract.

"Send me an email."

Happy to. But honestly, email's where these things die. Give me 2 minutes right now to ask 3 questions so the site I build actually fits your business. Then I'll email you a link when it's done.

"I don't have time for this."

Totally get it. That's why I do the free build first. You spend zero time until there's actually something to look at. Can I ask you 3 quick questions so I know what to build?

"I'll think about it."

Sure. Just so I know, what part are you thinking about? The free build, or the 500 after? [Forces them to name the real objection.]

Once You're In: Discovery Questions

After they engage, you have maybe 5 minutes before they bail. Use them on these, in this order. Take notes. You'll need this info for the build and for the ads conversation later.

1. What's your average ticket price or customer value?
2. How many new customers do you get a month right now?
3. Where are your customers coming from today? Google, referrals, walk-ins?
4. What's your busiest day? Slowest day?
5. Do you take bookings online, by phone, or in person?
6. What city or area do you mainly serve?
7. Are you the only owner, or are there partners I should know about?
8. How much would you be willing to spend to land one new customer?
9. What's the best email to send the redesign link to?

That last question is the ad budget anchor. If they say they'd spend $100 to land a customer worth $1,500, the ads conversation closes itself when you call back with the finished site.

Internal SOP: Spinning Up a New Client

Once a prospect agrees to the free build, you need to set up the deployment stack before handing off to the build team. This is the standard process.

Per-client cost: roughly $1 of the monthly fee

Whether you're charging the client $20, $50, or $100 per month, roughly one dollar of that covers the per-client email used to provision the backend. Everything else is margin or covers hosting overages.

Setup steps

1. Create a dedicated email for the client.

One email per client. This is what you'll use to provision their Supabase project, GitHub access, and any other tooling. Do not reuse emails across clients.

2. Store the email and password in 1Password.

Every client gets a 1Password entry. Title it with the client name and domain. You need to be able to log into any client's Supabase or other accounts at any time, especially during a handoff or a fix.

3. Sign up for Supabase using that email.

Supabase is free for one project per account. That's why each client gets their own email. Do not try to run multiple clients off one Supabase account. The second project gets charged.

4. Provision the project.

Run the schema.sql from the redesign skill. Grab the Supabase URL, anon key, and service role key. Drop them into Netlify environment variables and into the 1Password entry.

5. Create the GitHub repo and Netlify site.

Use the same client email if possible, or your team account if you've standardized on that. Connect the GitHub repo to Netlify so every push auto-deploys.

6. Document everything in 1Password.

By the time you're done, the 1Password entry should have: client email and password, Supabase login, Supabase URL and keys, GitHub repo URL, Netlify site URL, custom domain when added. If a developer needs to pick this up cold, they should be able to from that one entry.

Why this matters

Margins die when you can't find logins. If a client comes back two years later wanting a change and you can't log into their Supabase, you either rebuild from scratch or eat the loss. The 1Password discipline is the difference between a clean book of recurring revenue and a mess.

Quick Reference: Call Flow Cheat Sheet

Phase	What you say	What you're really doing
Open	Hey, crazy question...	Disarm. Pattern interrupt. Buy 10 seconds.
Pain	Looking at your site, costing you business.	Plant the loss. Make them defensive.
Diagnose	Winding down or trying to grow?	Force them to commit to wanting growth.
Offer	Free build. 500 if you like it.	Remove all risk. Make 'no' awkward.
Anchor	What's a customer worth to you?	Set up the ads conversation for the callback.
Close	What's the best email?	Get the contact, end the call, move on.

Rep mindset

- Smile before you dial. They can hear it.
- Pauses are weapons. Silence makes them talk.
- You're not begging for a sale. You're offering a free thing.
- Every 'no' is data. Track which variation wins for which industry.
- End every call with the next action defined. Always.
